A number of techniques are known in the prior art for dispensing minute quantities of fluid onto a test substrate, such as a microscope slide. Generally, the substrate is mounted on the tip of a pin (for example, a glass rod) which is inserted through a small aperture in a housing containing a reservoir of fluid. When the pin is depressed, the fluid is forced through the aperture and out the pin tip. Thus, the fluid is ejected or dispensed as a tiny droplet. In order to determine the concentration of certain antibodies or antigens in a specimen, an immunoassay is performed. In an immunoassay, a test sample such as a solution containing antibodies or antigens to be detected is placed in contact with a slide having a corresponding antibody or antigen fixed thereto. This is accomplished by applying the test sample to the slide. Then, the slide and sample are incubated under controlled conditions for a selected time period. During the incubation period, any antibodies or antigens in the test sample bound to the fixed antibody or antigen on the slide. However, any free antibodies or antigens in the test sample are eliminated from contact with the fixed antibody or antigen by immune complexes which may form between the free antibodies or antigens and the antibodies or antigens in the sample. After the incubation period, excess fluids are wiped from the slide. The slide is then washed and incubated under controlled conditions with a first immunological reagent, such as a labeled monoclonal antibody. Thereafter, the slide is washed, incubated with a second immunological reagent, such as an immunological probe, and the slide is then washed again. The concentration of antibodies or antigens in the test sample is determined by the presence and amount of labeled antibody or antigen which binds to the fixed antibody or antigen on the slide. Therefore, the
