A serial number is the number of a serial number which is a unique identifier for a computer program and is either hard coded or embedded with the program. Serial numbers are widely used for licensing purposes as they allow software vendors to identify and track the number of licenses that are in use. The serial number for the software is located in a hidden configuration file. The serial number is embedded in the software package itself. The serial number for the software is saved in a text file called "SerialNumber" which is saved in the "Program Files" folder of the operating system on the computer. To unlock/activate the software the serial number of the software is required. In most cases a simple web connection is enough to get the serial number from the server of the software manufacturer. The serial number is either printed on the front or back of the software package. If the serial number is embedded in the package then the software itself is already activated and the serial number cannot be changed or deleted.
