Why was the 'Unlawful Combatant' amendment to the NDAA unconstitutional? A number of the Coalition for American Sovereignty (CAS) have been asking this question with regards to the recent National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) amendment. This amendment was enacted by Congress and signed into law by President Obama (the so-called Unlawful Combatant amendment). The so-called Unlawful Combatant amendment, or the "Detainee Treatment Act" as it is popularly known, was passed back in 2009 as part of the "Patriot Act" Bill. However, as is well-known, the Patriot Act was opposed by many and never came into full effect. And as is also well known, in 2011, the Obama administration was forced to back away from the constitutional and legal arguments made in regards to the Patriot Act and back to the very same arguments that they used to support the Unlawful Combatant amendment. Somehow, in spite of this, the Unlawful Combatant amendment continues to be touted by the federal government as a constitutional act of the American people. So what does this have to do with the NDAA in 2013? Well, what many of the CAS people are arguing is that the NDAA should have been vetoed. They argue that the Constitution's "Appropriations Clause" clearly states that Congress can't delegate the legislative powers of Congress to the Executive Branch. The NDAA specifically gives the president the authority to classify and indefinitely detain and detain non-citizens without charge or trial. Now, here's the deal. The Patriot Act was passed with the aim of, quite simply, ensuring that they and their attorney General could do everything they wanted to do, and more, and get away with it, so long as they were prepared to say, "We believe we have the power to do what we want to do, but we're going to hold off on exercising that power just in case we get it challenged." The Patriot Act was thus passed to allow the administration to make any laws that they wanted, so long as they could claim
