laser (1064 microns) on gastric mucosa. In the first experiment, 12 rabbits had in the antrum mucosa an incision with a regular form of the Nd:YAG laser. The effect was evaluated with light microscopy, in order to detect signs of damage. In the second experiment, we studied the effect of the Nd:YAG laser on 14 gastric mucosa. In each case we used the form of the laser that was more effective and with lower energy and power. With this technique we were able to confirm the regularity of the incision. The healing of the incision was observed by means of endoscopy and in 7 days we observed scars with regular and regular healing. We concluded that the Nd:YAG laser is effective for resection of the gastric mucosa, with less tissue loss, in experimentally. Quantification of serotonin in the human pineal gland by high-performance liquid chromatography with electrochemical detection. The utility of high-performance liquid chromatography (HPLC)

with electrochemical detection (ECD) for the measurement of serotonin in the pineal gland is demonstrated. The serotonin extracted from human pineal tissue was quantified by HPLC with ECD, a method requiring minimal sample preparation. Analysis of the serotonin levels obtained by ECD showed peak areas ($\alpha = 0.015$) and plateaux ($\alpha = 0.027$) to be significantly higher than those obtained by fluorescence detection. The absolute quantification, expressed as ng/mg fresh tissue, is based on the determination of the response factors for both the ECD and fluorescence detection methods. The coefficients of variation (CV) for the
