It's also really tricky. The rules are very different in private space. Rules for launching spacecraft and for building space stations and creating a space ecosystem don't work the same as on Earth. Just take a look at the fate of the International Space Station (ISS). Over the years, NASA has spent a great deal of money to bring the ISS up to the point that it's at right now, creating a space station that, besides having lots of science and lots of testing, works great for living and working. But there's no company interested in a continuation of a huge government agency working in space. So if you don't want the space station, NASA has to come up with some plan to shut it down. The plan for ISS is to turn the space station into a museum. And there's no company with the capital to keep up a huge space station. The result is that the ISS is a lot of money down the drain. To be fair, if you want to build an organization into a huge, complex operation, you have to start from the bottom. That's why the ISS has had so many problems and, frankly, I think it's a huge waste of money. If you want to build something that's going to be around for a long time and you want it to be successful, you have to start with what's going to be around for a long time, and that's the rules of the private sector. Rules in space To date, all of the orbital rockets and space shuttles have
