The need for rapid tests to detect the tetracycline-resistant bacterium, Streptococcus pyogenes, has been highlighted. A quantitative culture method, which requires between 18 and 21 hours of incubation, was used to detect the presence of this bacterium in throat swabs from children attending a child health clinic. A colourimetric method for detecting this bacterium, using a latex-agglutination test, was also evaluated. The colourimetric method was more rapid (3 to 5 hours) and gave similar results to the culture method.Update: Progress Report – Third Quarter I've been working on another update for my monthly progress report. I didn't get to this quite as soon as I thought.
