The New York City-based Epiphany School, an Orthodox Jewish day school, requested a $1.9 million grant from the state in 2017 to modernize its library and create a new facility to support its increasingly popular independent study program. But in April, after the school's request had been submitted, the Education Department announced that it had not been approved because it "did not contain sufficient information for the [school] to make an informed decision on the subject matter and content of the library." The remaining amount of $1.4 million in state funds was granted to the school, which received an additional $680,000 for renovations in May. Independent Study, not Associated with a Regular Class In an August letter to Sen. Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) — the state's most powerful Democrat — Catherine Ruckelshaus, director of the Education Department's Office of Independent Study, said the situation was "unacceptable." "This policy could have been a boon to students by allowing independent study offerings in math, science, or any other subject," Ruckelshaus wrote. "I know many districts who would have liked to be able to offer similar study opportunities to their students." Epiphany responded to the letter in December, suggesting the agency consider reopening the request. "It is impossible to start the process again when the first action has been irreparably completed," the letter said. "Mr. Schumer should work with the State Education Department to change the law that was the cause of this situation." The New York State Board of Regents initially approved Epiphany's request in November 2017. It's unclear whether a potential change to the law will lead to a revised approval. In June, New York City Comptroller Scott String ba244e880a
