The public has had a growing interest in the Internet as a source of information and many large cities (such as Paris, Amsterdam, Brussels, London, Barcelona, Mexico City, São Paulo, etc.) have made available municipal information on their websites. This has been the case for a few years: the policy of the many departments of municipalities has moved towards Web 2.0 and a co-production of public services and public consultation. The eGovernment 2.0 represents an evolution of the web 2.0 in a more intensive way and corresponds to a more extensive development of the Web 2.0. In this type of eGovernment 2.0, there is a growing fusion of the Internet and digital devices, such as the Web 2.0, the sensors, the mobile, WebTV, etc., in which the Internet has a central role. In a truly Web 2.0, the citizens live in a global space and may access any type of information (an unlimited number of resources) by being connected through the Internet. The Web 2.0 thus results from the use of a strong social networking site, such as Facebook (www.facebook.com), We-tou, etc., which offers to the citizens, perhaps for the first time in the history of mankind, a real common space free of social and cultural barriers. Besides, this Web 2.0 provides real common spaces that are not limited to the users themselves. It provides a new global space where people from all around the world can gather and communicate with each other, where all are equal. Public Administration has recently been shifting towards the Internet. Public and private websites have been appearing on the Web, following the Belgian example. One of the main actors of this phenomenon is the Belgian municipality. To implement the growth of e-government, many municipalities have put at their disposal a broad infrastructure network enabling the Internet. This network may consist of a local router (which is very old) and a local DSL-line, also very old (commonly a phone line from a telecom operator). In a context of eGovernment 2.0, the technical infrastructure of a municipality might seem old, but it is interesting to 3da54e8ca3
