Aphasia and thought disorder in severe head injury: a diagnostic challenge. Thought disorder is one of the most persistent neuropsychological manifestations following severe head injury. It may be of particular difficulty to understand and describe within standard nosological systems. This may explain its underreporting in clinical practice. We report a study of thought disorder in a sample of severely head injured subjects. In order to facilitate the interpretation of thought disorder, we also report the results of a detailed assessment of language and semantic knowledge in these individuals. Subjects were interviewed on admission to hospital; a detailed neuropsychological assessment was undertaken at 3, 6 and 9 months after admission. Thought disorder was present in the majority of the sample (97.3%) and was a significant predictor of outcome. Thought disorder in this sample of patients appeared to be related to an impaired sense of social reality as well as to a broad deficit in semantic knowledge. It is suggested that aphasia may have masked the presentation of thought disorder. The need to assess thought disorder is also discussed.Look, I'm just a regular guy living life as best I can and, you know, keeping to myself But I do like to share things with the ones I love and I've found that in the beginning you know, I didn't want to share my feelings with anyone I used to have a crush on this girl and I talked to her but I didn't talk to her about what I really had to say And then I was like, "I should just share this with her first" So I was wrong. That's why I'm here, I'm here, I love you guys! First I need to say something Because I love you guys so much! My life is actually the most amazing thing I mean that is a thing that's real I tell you I talk about it like I feel it, which is how I act You know I'm a real person and then my happiness, my family, it doesn't matter it's just that my emotions. You want to know the truth? In the video that's going to come out,

MT-CO2 gene polymorphism in ischemic stroke in Tunisian patients. Genetic variation in the mitochondrial cytochrome C oxidase (mt-Cox) is associated with age-related disorders such as Alzheimer disease and type 2 diabetes mellitus. The aim of this study was to evaluate the involvement of the mt-Cox gene in the etiopathogenesis of ischemic stroke. One hundred and thirty-nine consecutive Tunisian patients with acute ischemic stroke of less than 3 days were examined. Patients were diagnosed by computed tomography and magnetic resonance imaging. The polymorphism of the mt-CO2 gene was analyzed by the PCR method. Our results indicated that the polymorphism of the mt-CO2 gene was not significantly associated with ischemic stroke in Tunisian patients.email = $email; } public function getEmail() { return $this->email; } public function setExpiration($expiration) { $this->expiration = $expiration; } public function getExpiration() { return $this->expiration; } public function setIatToken($iatToken) { $this->iatToken =
